What is a bilingual child?

The way I see it, being bilingual means being able to communicate almost perfectly in two languages and also knowing something about both cultures. If I A1 _____ the example of my daughter, it's about being able to understand when someone is speaking another language and being able to A2 _____ automatically into speaking it with them. A3 _____ two and a half she has already understood that 'Daddy speaks French and Mummy speaks English'. I think it's very important for her to know that the cartoon character Noddy is also called Oui Oui by her friends at playgroup and that there are Marmite and Cadburys chocolate as well as croissants. This is what makes it A4 _____ for her to communicate with the people around her no matter whether they are French or English.

In our case it is A5 _____ that with an English mother and a French father our children should be able to speak both languages to communicate, not only with us, but with their grandparents and the A6 _____ of the family. Learning two or more languages helps children to A7 _____ cultures other than their own. If speaking their mother tongue(s) at home and at school is encouraged they are more likely to enjoy their difference and view difference in general as a positive thing.
